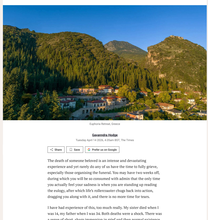
My Greek grief retreat in the Peloponnese

After the death of her mother, Cassandra Uladge found solace in Greece's Euphoria Retreat and the magic mountains that surround it



Euphoria Retreat, Greece

Cassandra Uladge
Saturday April 13 2024, 6:30am BST, The Times

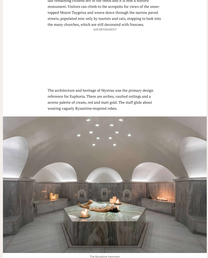
Share Save Prefer me on Google

The death of someone beloved is an intense and devastating experience and yet rarely do any of us have the time to fully grieve, especially those organising the funeral. You may have two weeks off, during which you will be so consumed with admin that the only time you have to yourself is when you're in the shower, or sitting in the car on the eulogy, after which life's rollercoaster chugs back into action, dragging you along with it, and there is no more time for tears.

I have had experience of this, too much, sadly. My sister died when I was 21 and I was 23 when my father died. I was in my 30s when I had a sense of short, sharp intermittent grief and then normal existence resumed. In both cases my sadness — vast, raw, unfathomable — had to be tucked away just so I could continue. This meant that the unprocessed grief resurfaced years, sometimes even decades later, manifesting unexpectedly in the unexpected ways.

Luxury newsletter The inside track on tech, travel, philanthropy and the hottest handbags, cars and spas. Sign up with one click.

With my mother's death last year I organised her funeral, as I had my father's; I was determined to do things differently. And so, three months after sitting beside her at Croydon University Hospital, holding her frail hand as she took her final breaths, I travelled to the Euphoria Retreat in Greece, hoping that there I would find the space and support I needed to grieve.



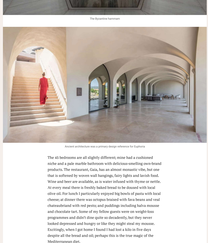
Euphoria has spectacular views over the plains of Sparta

Euphoria is the creation of Marina Efstratoglou. In her twenties she survived cancer, an experience that Marina has quoted her interest in the connections between lifestyle and wellbeing. After this she founded a wellness company, Pure Greek, which specialised in Greek herbal Tisanes to research various healing practices. In the process Efstratoglou visited numerous spas, but often found them soulless and overmedicalised. So in 2018 she opened her own spa in the Peloponnese, constructed around a restored 18th-century mansion and surrounded by pine forests. Guests are treated to ancient Greek philosophies and traditional Chinese medicine. Here grains can be nourished and healed, rather than suffer and endure denial.

ADVERTISEMENT

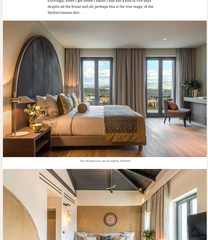
For me, coming from London, which had been under thick rain clouds for what felt like the whole of winter, one of the first joyful things about being at Euphoria was waking up to sunshine and sitting on my terrace with a cup of Greek mountain tea and an extraordinary view. Euphoria sits on the foothills of Mystras, a city founded near Sparta on the 4th century BC, and above the hilltop site of Mystras. This was established in the 13th century, initially by the Franks, but became a fortified city under the Byzantines and the Ottomans. In fact remaining citizens left in the 1860s and it is now a historic monument and ruins. Guests can in the acropolis for views of the now-toppled Mount Taygetus and weave down through the narrow paved streets, populated now with tourists and cats, stopping to look into the many churches, which are still decorated with frescoes.

ADVERTISEMENT



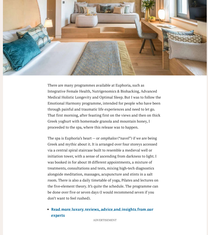
The Byzantine basement

The architecture and heritage of Mystras was the primary design reference for Euphoria. There are arches, vaulted ceilings and a palette of cream, red and matt gold. The staff glide about wearing vaguely Byzantine-inspired robes.



Ancient architecture was a primary design reference for Euphoria

The six bedrooms are all slightly different; mine had a cushioned niche and a pale marble bathroom with delicious-smelling sea-based products. The restaurant, Gaia, has an almost romantic vibe, but one that is softened by screen-wall hangings by the Athens artist Lydi Kanli. Wine and beer are available, as is water infused with thyme or nettle. At every meal there is freshly baked bread to be dunked with local olive oil, but Kanli's particularly enjoyed big bowls of pasta with local mushrooms and herbs, and a delicious dessert of Greek yoghurt and chamomile honey with red pesto and puddings including baklava mousse and chocolate tart. Some of my fellow guests were on weight-loss programmes and didn't dive quite so decadently, but they never looked depressed and hungry or like they might steal my mousse. Excitingly, when I got home I found I had lost a kilo in five days, despite all the bread and oil, perhaps this is the true magic of the Mediterranean diet.

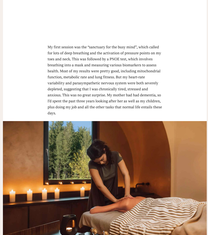


The 60 bedrooms are all slightly different

The spa is Euphoria's heart — or omphalos ("navel") if we are being Greek and mythic about it. It is arranged over four storeys accessed via a central spiral staircase built to resemble a waterfall and/or initiation tower, with a sense of ascending from darkness to light. I was hooked in for about 48 different appointments, a mixture of treatments, consultations and tests, mixing high-tech diagnostics with traditional therapies, and I was impressed by every one of them. There is also a daily timetable of yoga, Pilates and lectures on the five-element theory. It's quite the programme (because can be done over five or seven days; I would recommend seven if you don't want to feel rushed).

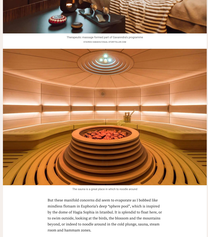
Read more luxury reviews, advice and insights from our experts

ADVERTISEMENT



There are many programmes available at Euphoria, such as Therapeutic Massage Normalisation of Transmitter Congestions

My first session was the "sanctuary for the busy mind", which called for a "bespoke combination" of Swedish massage, reflexology, warm stone and neck. This was followed by a PNOE test, which involves breathing into a mask and measuring various biomarkers to assess health. Most of my results were pretty good, including mitochondrial function, metabolic rate and lung fitness. But my heart-rate variability and parasympathetic nervous system were also severely depleted, suggesting that I was chronically tired, stressed and overworked. Which I knew, but it was helpful to have it quantified, so I'll spare the poor three you're looking after but as well as my children, plus doing my job and all the other tasks that normal life entails these days.



Therapeutic Massage Normalisation of Transmitter Congestions

The sauna is a great place in which to muddle around

But these manifold concerns did seem to evaporate as I lolloped like Grandma Ephraim in Euphoria's deep "sphere pool", which is inspired by the shape of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul. It is splendid to float here, or to swim outside, looking at the birds, the blossom and the mountains beyond, or indeed to swoosh around in the cold plunge, sauna, steam room and hammam annex.

But my favourite way to relax is hiking, and there are some incredible paths here. There are daily guided walks, but I am a solo beast, so I downloaded the Spartan Trails app and headed off for myself, past bright green fields of olive trees and beautiful citrus groves, up into the mountains where snow, according to myth, first pursued Sisyphus. It was the end of February and it had been raining for about a month, so the mountains were green and lush, rather than dry and brown, as the mountain path was fringed with primary — euphorbia, red fennel, poppies — that was almost indecently lush. Above me waterfalls thundered and eagles circled. But what was even more awe-inspiring was that along one of the routes were two churches, the first built inside a cave, the second located in what must be the most beautiful glade I have ever visited. These felt like genuinely sacred, peaceful, wise locations, and good places to sit a while and say goodbye to my mum.

There are many scenic hiking paths around Euphoria, which is surrounded by pine forests

I found that a combination of walks and the treatments offered at Euphoria helped me to process my grief in a way that I hadn't previously had room with Mary Yasmeena, who acts as Euphoria's spiritual guide. Over three long sessions, sitting in her bright fourth-floor space on huge embroidered cushions and bolsters, we talked about my mother and how hard the final years had been for her and for me, how they had seemed to overshadow everything else. We talked about other traumas, the loss of my sister and father. Yasmeena led me on guided meditations and breathwork exercises. I had been to other sessions over complemented by therapies such as "hormonal release massage", which involved a lot of work on my stomach as this is where we store tension and fear, and the most luminous but also amazing treatment I've ever had — sound bath chakra healing. This involved sounding tuning forks along various parts of my body and the application of different scented oils, which together sent me into some sort of visionary trance.

On the last night, as I rushed back to my room after a delicious dinner of raw tuna tartare and lamb chops, not really sure exactly where I was going because I was so busy staying up in the incredible night sky, I realised that being here had been exactly as it was supposed to be, and that I had let go of some of my sadness and heaviness, and that I felt lighter and happier as a result. It was, I felt, almost euphoric.

ADVERTISEMENT

A classic room with the Essential Harmony programme and full board costs £4,230 for five days and £5,810 for seven days. This excludes alcoholic beverages, transfers and flights. euphoriaretreat.com